I met Matthew Arnold in Piccadilly and walked with him to St. James s Place. His talk was interesting, but his Dundreary manner is curious in a man of such austere intellectual taste. He said that Carlyle had never satisfied him. George Eliot s books he did not like, though he recognised her power of drawing character. He had no great opin1on of Lowell as a poet, better as a critic. Thought Benjamin Franklin s autobiography very poor, Richard s Maxims the best American book. He had not been able to care much yet for Bret Harte, but thought he might do so; was going to read him to his daughters. Had lately re-read David Copperfield, and had liked it much more than he had ever done before, being struck with its vigorous talent. He had been more thanked for his last...
